Recommendation for Stefan Mau

One of the great delights of teaching at the university level is to discover that a student has a much deeper and more comprehensive understanding of the subject matter than what is observed in his peers. An even greater (and much rarer) joy is to have the privilege to instruct a student who rises far above his colleagues because of his ability to think critically in problem solving, his ability to synthesize and see "the bigger picture," and his ability to communicate clearly. These are the skills that businesses claim are the most important attributes they look for in new hires and why I am very pleased to recommend Stefan Mau to you for your serious consideration. He possesses all these traits and more.

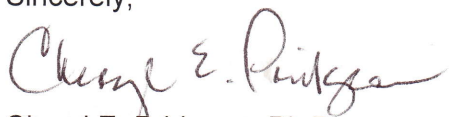

Stefan was a student of mine in a graduate class on critical thinking this past fall term. I have to say, he took me by surprise. Stefan is a quiet, reflective person who was often one of the last people to speak, but when he spoke, not only did the sophistication of his thinking far surpass the others in the class, it was marked by a breadth and depth of analysis that demonstrated insight, thoroughness, and originality.

As a result, Stefan frequently demonstrated a more practical and more comprehensive solution to problems presented in our Harvard Case Studies due to his skill in understanding the business issues, discerning the difference between core problems and mere symptoms, and effectively sorting through and evaluating options. I must admit, after listening to the rest of the class struggling to stay on course with their analysis and difficulty in identifying the core problem, it would be extraordinarily refreshing to see Stefan cut through the "noise" of the case and the "going-nowhere-discussion" with a laser-like focus that would lay out the situation with such clarity and precision that it would literally be arresting—a "eureka" or "ah ha" moment of understanding for everyone.

The true critical thinker is one who aware of the weaknesses in human thinking, humble enough to admit to them in his own thinking, self-disciplined enough to regularly monitor his thinking for errors, and dedicated enough to continually work on improving his thinking. In the conversations I have had with Stefan, I can clearly see all of these attributes. At the same time, while remaining open-minded, Stefan is confident in his ability to reason through problems and their implications.

There are very few students to whom I would give my highest, unreserved recommendation, but Stefan Mau is one of these. He is a man of great potential who would be an asset to any company. I am confident that you will find him to be the exceptional person I know him to be.

Sincerely,

Cheryl E. Pridgeon, Ph.D.

To Whom It May Concern:

I am very pleased to write this recommendation on behalf of Stefan Mau. Stefan was a student in a course that I taught in the MBA program at Northwood University.

By way of background, I am a tax lawyer and spent a substantial portion of my 40 year career practicing law. I retired from Deloitte Tax LLP as National Leader of the Deloitte Multistate Tax Desk and Controversy practice. As a result, I believe that I have a great insight into the skills and personality traits that a person needs to succeed, to be a leader and to be an effective team member in the work place.

Stefan has all of those qualifications. The Northwood MBA program emphasizes working as a group to learn together. Stefan was one of the brightest, most business savvy students.

Stefan was particularly skilled at understanding financial statements and data. Not only did he understand the data, he used his critical thinking skills to make practical and savvy business decisions in our case studies. By doing so his group would come up with sophisticated approaches to a particular problem.

Additionally, I saw Stefan work with his classmates to help them understand sophisticated concepts. He often took a leadership role in class by explaining and helping his classmates understand sophisticated financial and accounting concepts and to understand and apply data driven solutions to the problem at hand. He is insightful, analytical, and quick to learn new ideas.

I therefore offer my recommendation of Stefan without reservation. If you have any questions or require further information, please do not hesitate to contact me.

Sincerely,
